Big rise in CO2

US climate scientists in Colorado have recorded a big rise in the amount of carbon dioxide in the world's atmosphere. Their research indicates that 2005 saw one of the largest increases ever recorded. David Shukman reports from Colorado:

Air samples have been taken from the Rocky Mountains and other parts of the world

Carbon dioxide is seen as the key gas driving global warming so its level is monitored very closely. Samples of air are gathered all over the world and sent here to Boulder in Colorado to the US government's global monitoring project. Studies show that the level of carbon dioxide now stands at three hundred and eighty one parts per million. That's a record, according to the researchers. It's the result of one of the largest annual increases for the past fifty years and it confirms a trend - that the rate of increase has doubled in the last thirty years. We asked the British government's chief scientist for his reaction. Sir David King says the new figures are worrying.

Today we're at three hundred and eighty parts per million, we're over three eighty parts a million. This is higher than the amount of carbon dioxide in our atmosphere for at least a million years, possibly for thirty million years. So mankind is changing the climate.

This sharp increase comes just as the Kyoto Treaty takes effect. It's meant to bring carbon emissions down. The evidence of this new data is clear though - that efforts to curb the rise in greenhouse gases are, for the moment, failing, and the consequences that climate scientists have long warned about look far more likely.

Teacher Tips

- This quiz is designed to be run in the style of a pub quiz and ONLY give out 1 sheet of paper at a time, otherwise they will cheat in Round 10 in particular.
- This quiz is designed to come after a period of familiarity with the exam to consolidate knowledge.
- The point system has been deliberately left out, so that it can be adjusted with double point rounds and bonus points. Use this to motivate students if one team pulls ahead.
- You may want to adjust the times in the exam for your students. The table is a guide only and you should change it to suit your students.
- There is an emphasis on grammar in this quiz, because it isn't normally taught in IELTS course books, but the grammar questions ONLY focus on common mistakes seen in IELTS writing papers.

Resources required for this Quiz

- Board Pens, at least 2 for students to write on the board at the same time
- A copy for each team of the script at: http://www.bbc.co.uk/worldservice/learningenglish/radio/specials/1128_london_life/page3.shtml or a version they can listen to. An MP3 can be downloaded.
- Copies of the quiz itself, I'd suggest 1 for each team.
